The state's Seacoast beaches will remain closed for the time being, with Sununu citing concerns that opening New Hampshire's coast without similar re-openings in Massachusetts will lead to an influx of out-of-staters, potentially spreading the virus.

Campgrounds, which have been allowed to remain open during the state of emergency, will now only be permitted to host New Hampshire residents or members. Pools and other communal outdoor spaces at campgrounds will remain closed.

Sununu made no announcements concerning summer camps, despite making it a priority sector for his reopening task force, which has spent the past two weeks working on a set of recommendations.

Places of worship, hotels, gyms, bowling alleys and similar places where large crowds may gather will remain closed for the time being, with no timetable announced for when restrictions may be lifted.

"We are not taking a giant leap forward," said Sununu. "We are just not at that point, but we do want to provide the opportunity to flex some of these things open."
